

My Nonhuman Friends by Nika Sandler

Self-published

I am endlessly fascinated by the book My Nonhuman Friends, created by the artist Nika Sandler. Her work sensitively conveys the tender and delicate bond between humans and cats, while challenging the anthropocentric view of the world.

Splinter by Eva Vermandel

Sometimes a book finds you at exactly the right moment. Eva Vermandel's Splinter is one of those. Her photographs feel like fragments of memory — some unsettling, some achingly tender — all bound together by a sublime, almost ethereal use of light. It is the kind of light that feels like it belongs to the subject, not the photographer, as if it simply existed and she had the grace to notice. There's a rare lightness of touch here, the kind that makes you lean in rather than step back. In a world where so much photography tries too hard to impress, Splinter trusts its own quiet strength.

The images need no embellishment, no loud gestures. They breathe, they hold, they speak for themselves. Each page feels like a private encounter, offered without expectation, and that intimacy is what makes this book so extraordinary. It's the kind of work that reminds me why I fell in love with photography in the first place — and is a book that makes my heart soar.

Body of Work by Trina O'Hara

Snap Collective

Body of Work transcends the conventional photobook as a showcase of an artist's portfolio. O'Hara's offering goes further, presenting readers with a combination of generous, captivating images.

The book distinguishes itself by openly sharing the artist's creative process, motivations, and philosophical underpinnings and is thoughtfully curated to provide not only the same visual pleasure as a stroll through a museum, but also a source of inspiration for readers to move their own practices forward.

Body of Work encourages us to explore our own creative potential and embark on artistic journeys with fresh eyes and is more than a display of an artist's achievements; it is a catalyst for artistic growth and self-discovery.
